

To my fellow Austenasian friends across the aisle,

I believe that, despite our political differences, we all share the same underlying passion: a genuine love for Austenasia as a project. We may disagree about the direction it should take, but that shared appreciation is something we should never lose sight of.

To be frank, I have found the constant bickering between our two factions to be exhausting. It serves neither your community nor ours, and it is ultimately unhelpful for Austenasia as a whole. We should not be defining ourselves by reacting to one another or allowing disputes to become the centre of our efforts.

Fundamentally, we're both Austenasia, and neither of us are Austenasia. Austenasia began in the imagination of a thirteen-year-old boy, and I don't think even he could have imagined how far it would grow in the years that followed.

Neither of our communities is that original Austenasia anymore. Time has changed it, people have shaped it, and history has taken it in different directions. What we each have today is a continuation of that shared origin, interpreted through different visions for the future. Rather than trying to recreate the past, we should recognise that reality and focus on building something worthwhile from the legacy we inherited.

Ship of Theseus, basically.

Whatever our differences, the focus should remain on building, creating, and strengthening the communities we care about. Politics has its place, but it should come second to the reason we all became involved in the first place: our shared enthusiasm for Austenasia.

We are open to discussing a mutually beneficial co-existence arrangement between our two factions. If that is an outcome that you share, then please get in contact with me or our representatives.

Your favourite Prime Minister,

Andrew Musgrave
